Taylor continued to work for Blagojevich as the Governor of Illinois, directing a wide range of legislative issues, including Human Services, Transportation, and Environment.

This work led him to several opportunities such as a lobbyist for the financial services industry on the State level; where he passed laws in several states which added to the financial protection of citizens across the country. On the federal level he served as the Policy/Legislative Director at Polsinelli law firm, in Washington DC. During this time Taylor established The Penny Institute which focused on political education and civic engagement. The Penny Institute was created to educate citizens on their capabilities and responsibilities to change their circumstances in their neighborhoods and lives through the political process.

After years of working for several elected officials and lobbying he stepped away to become the Regional Political Director and an African American Faith Based Coordinator on the 2008 Obama/Biden Presidential Campaign in Virginia. He also served on President Obama's Transition Team. Taylor then started, owned and operated a political consulting practice where he connected professional athletes, entertainers, and notables to the different levels of national politics.

After almost twenty years on the state and national political scene Taylor began a second career in finance. He was recruited by Northwestern Mutual where he became an experienced strategic personal financial and life insurance planner. He later became a broker for AFLAC and Combined Worksite Solutions. He specializes in a variety of insurance planning services such as life insurance; personal/business retirement planning, employee benefit plans, personal planning analysis, and long term financial guidance.

He has appeared on the FOX Morning News, BET, and on XM/SIRUS radio. Taylor has been a key note speaker in schools from the District of Columbia to Florida.
